The letter said "come," and with a sigh o relief I laid it upon the table before me, and ooked into the dusty streets.
I was a working woman in the city of New York. Whether I trimmed bonnets for Madame La Mode, measured off laces for noiselle her daughter, kept books, read set type, or even wrote editorials for tarry Host, is a matter of no consequence. Suffice it to say, I was tired. In my dreams I "babble of green fields." I om and rest. But where should I go? Like Joanna Gayworthy, I found the wor.

sand lashes many shades darker than the hair, slight girlish figure, c ad in a simple, graceful costume that would have passed unchallenged anywhere. Such was the picture that greeted my eyes as Cousin Hiram's pair of handsome grays awept round the corner, and flope came forward to the torner, and flope came forward to the termination of the most favored of mortals but Mordecai ast at the king's gate, and the soul of Haman was troubled.

It was the old, old story—older than the days of the Montagues and Capulets—almost and been first ambitions and rivalries, then harsh words and bitter recriminations, hatreds and revenges. Now all had settled down into a deep and silent enmity. Hirsm Gardner and Thomas Remington lived upon adjoining farms; could have clasped hands across the narrow aisle as they sat in their pews on Sunday; met each other daily in streets, at the post office, in the market place. But they never spoke, never rocepaized each other by glance or sign. Yet they were both good men—men who should have loved each other. Perhaps deep down "Now-Il like him." How and like they never spoke, never rocepaized each other by glance or sign. Yet they were both good men—men who should have loved each other. Perhaps deep down "Now-Il like him." He's a fine many there is and benefit ambiting?" May be live were both good men—men who should have loved each other. Perhaps deep down "Now-Il like him." I noticed that when these moods were upon her her mother watched her furtively, and her father's brow darkened strangely. Yet his manner toward her was inexpressibly tender. She was, indeed, the very apple of his eye—this "Hope" that had been born to him after all his other children had been laid under the sad.
